Creator marketing

Five brief mistakes that quietly burn creator budget.

From 850+ creator deals. None
look expensive until the reshoot.

01 · Writing their script

You hired a voice, then muted it.

A word-for-word script makes a creator sound like an ad. Their audience scrolls. Give them the one thing to get across and let them say it their way.

02 · Six key messages

If everything matters, nothing lands.

A 30-second video can carry one message, maybe two. Pick the one that matters. The rest goes on the landing page, not in the creator's mouth.

03 · No approved claims

Vague claims mean late rewrites.

If the brief doesn't list exactly what can be said about the product, legal finds out at draft stage. That's when changes cost the most. List the approved claims up front.

04 · Feedback from everyone

Four reviewers, four directions.

When nobody owns approval, the creator gets contradicting notes and a third round.
Name one approver and cap feedback at two rounds in the brief.

05 · Hiding the real plan

Say if it'll run as an ad.

Creators film differently for paid use: clean hooks, cutdowns, no time-bound jokes. Hide that, and you pay again for edits. Put usage and the real KPI in the brief.

Before you send any brief

01 One message, not six

02 Approved claims listed

03 One named approver

04 Usage and KPI stated
